QUEEN AND HORSE SHOW

Why Liliuokalani
Failed to Get Rooms.

Queen Liliuokalani was the victim of peculiar circumstances when she and her little party applied from hotel to hotel for apartments upon their recent visit to the metropolis. From an authoritative source in Honolulu the real reason has been learned of the queen's failure to secure apartments. In a letter written to one of her friends which arrived on the Sonoma, the queen tells of the incidents of her visit to New York, of which much appeared in the mainland newspapers, and also of her journey across the continent after leaving San Francisco. Her letter is dated at Washington, where the queen and her party are comfortably and happily located in one of the family hotels, the young folk being especially delighted with the National capital.

The queen writes that when she arrived in New York the city was full of guests, who came to attend the annual horse show, and to do their holiday shopping. They came from all parts of the country, many being from across the "pond," and "all of them millionaires." They had hired suites in advance. The queen's party arrived too late to get a show for apartments in the best hotels. After calling at four in an unsuccessful quest for accommodations, they were content to accept a suite of rooms at the Roland House.

Liliuokalani was delighted with a drive through Central Park, the party being pleased with what they saw of the 4th of the metropolis, and the pick of the finest riding and driving horses in the country. While domiciled at the Roland Hotel, thirty reporters issued statements to their papers that the queen and her party had been sent away from the different hotels because of the color line; but Liliuokalani states that this was not so. She admits that she was at fault in not engaging rooms ahead of arrival.

SOLDIER WHO SOWS WATCHES

Regular Disposes of Many Time
Pieces Along Crowded Streets.

When he was walking along Fort street the day before Christmas, he looked the picture of despair, and every street the day before Christmas, he touched with sympathy for unknown misfortunes. Yesterday he strode along King street with the air of a conqueror. Yet he was the same man, the difference was in his feel—and his pocket. And it is a tale of industry and thrift that his experience tells.

Christmas was to be a dry day for many of the young soldiers on the transport Hancock, and it seemed only natural that some of them should be willing to part with their most valuable possessions, all except the inevitable camera, rather than spend the day without any cheer. One young man in uniform was often seen along the downtown streets, mingling with the shopping crowds, and when he saw what seemed to be an impressionable man, to approach him and offer his watch. Most of those who were thus accosted thought that it was a case of the youth wanting to sell his timepiece to raise the means of enjoying the holiday.

The only point which aroused suspicion was that he was seen very often at the same game, and many times he succeeded. It developed later that the youth was a dealer in watches; that he has on hand continually a stock, all of the same grade, the cases of the most attractive chased patterns in gold and the works of a very good grade. The method of his procedure was given as this: When he found any one who would look into his bargain he would show a watch which is a very pretty one indeed. The price is a matter of the customer. If the probable buyer seems to be interested the price may be as high as $20, but if he lacks enthusiasm he may be baited with $5. Altogether it is a good play and the nibbler is generally caught.

So it was, that according to reports, the young soldier who was in search of sympathy, got lots of it and also cash, and his sympathizers usually made a better bargain than some other purchasers of similar articles from an unknown, for they got a watch, not a bribe. But while the times were propitious and the holiday crowds bought somewhere near a dozen of his timepieces, it is said that by steady attention to business on Saturdays and other holidays for instead of being a transport soldier he is a regular, stationed at Camp McKimley, this youth with a system has sown watches about a considerable portion of the city, and some of the surrounding country. And he avers that his watches are good timepieces and always carries one to prove his assertion, and will sell on the slightest offer.

A Scow Upsets.

The tug Leslie Baldwin recently towed a scow load of goods to Kahakuloa. The surf was running high, and one boat, loaded with flour and other goods, was swamped. Some of those on board escaped but did not care to risk returning to the Baldwin, and walked home. Ferd Hons of Kahului, in whose veins course the blood of the old Vikings, scorned the danger, and at the expense of a good ducking, made his way back to the Baldwin, and rode home triumphant.—Mail News.
